O'Melveny chair Bradley Butwin was featured in this American Lawyer interview about his work and home life during the coronavirus pandemic.

"Many families have gathered together to weather self-isolating mandates across the country," the publication wrote. "But few could match the legal—and canine—congregation now assembled under the Long Island roof of O'Melveny & Myers' Bradley Butwin."

Butwin, who was just reelected to another term as O'Melveny's chair, is quarantining with his wife of 31 years; his oldest daughter, a first-year associate at Davis Polk & Wardwell; his two sons, recent Fordham Law grads who are headed to Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison and Proskauer Rose, respectively; a fiancé; his youngest daughter, a high school junior; and three dogs, Am Law explained.

"The house requires extensive coordination and lots of quiet time. Our protocol is to start with a group chat in the morning and find out who needs quiet time and when," said Butwin. "As a practical matter, just as the pandemic is a once in a century issue, I think this is a once in a lifetime opportunity for us. I would like to say that we will continue to be together as much as we are now, but the reality is this is a really busy family doing things that require their attention."
