O'Melveny special counsel Scott Pink was quoted in this article, which discusses the uptick in cybersecurity attacks during the coronavirus pandemic and what clients can do to defend themselves.

"Pink said he's...fielded questions from clients about privacy issues related to collecting employee health information," the article reported. "He said he's advised them that they should not overlook privacy laws and regulations in responding to requests for information from the government about worker health, because regulators have indicated they will enforce privacy statutes."

"It's a little bit on the fly, but these companies need to do the best they can do to comply," Pink told the publication.
